It's not much more than a scratch," said she; go Alick groaned misers ly. "Surely, MissKatie, it"s he hard heart you've got for all your bonnie face," said he, reproachfully. Katie blushed. Nobody else's compliments had ever had that pleasing effect before, and Alick suddenly took heart of grace, and said one or two more pretty things that did not seem to vez Katie very much. The dressing of the wound being done. Alick was obliged to go back to the field; carrying the lowance was an excuse for Katie to return too: so leaving her hall to the mercy of the cat on the floor, she got the basket and stone bottle of beer ready, and followed Alick. The reapers said lowance was early that day, and her father found fault about it, Alick's reflections were of a more cheerful turn now "Too many rivals may be as good as none." he thought. Indeed, he thought. Indeed, he had found out—who knows by what freemason, the first liked nobody so well as him, and the provision Emp-sum to No. 5 Planix Block, he turned his discovery to good account. ance, as, with his gun on his arm and his gamethe slung over his shoulder, he followed the squire in the woods—looking, as she thought the finer and handsomer gentleman. That Johnny's face had now become perfectly sickong to her, and none the less so because Kester would talk of their marriage; for the young man had been chosen village schoolmuster, with a sulery of thirty pounds, a cottage and garden rent-free, and coals ad libitum; that he had a home to take her to.

Kutie was having a good cry one afternoon in the house by hercelf, over the thoughts of Johnny, when there came a knock to the door. She got up and opened it, expecting to see a neighbor come in for a gossip, but, instead, there stood Alick. Directly he saw what she had been about he eried, Who has been vexing thee, Katie? Only tell me-tell me, Katie." And a smile broke through her tears as she said. "Oh, Alick. it's that Johnny," and they looked in each other's faces and laughed.

What Alick said more this tradition betray eth, not, but, whatever it was, Johnny's prospect of a wife were not increased thereby, and when Atick went away home to his cottage at the pack-gate it was with a triumphant step, and his corly head in the air, and Katie cried no mor over her knitting that afternoon.
